Introduction

The preparation of our Second Salon Catalogue is the occasion for a thoughtful review of our responsibilities to the 634 individuals who submitted 2466 photographs for the judges' consideration. This impressive response is more than double that of last year.

Washington's international role has made it particularly relevant to welcome foreign prints, and it is gratifying to have received entries from 28 countries. These prints were judged separately, and the possible difficulties of supply were taken into consideration by the jurors.

We are particularly grateful to the six distinguished members of the juries, whose task of selecting from among the world's best photography was not an easy one. Emphasis was placed on the print itself, as independent of its record in past salons as of the reputation of its maker.

We are indebted to that group of volunteers whose work behind the scenes made the exhibition possible, and to The Corcoran Gallery of Art for recognition of our efforts in allowing the exhibition to be held in this gallery.

Preface

The question of the propriety of an art museum's exhibiting photographs as serious works of art fortunately is a dead one, and The Corcoran Gallery is pleased to participate in the current broad and intelligent enthusiasm for the medium by playing host to the present exhibition.

With the battle for serious consideration fairly won, and equipped with the great repertoire of techniques supplied by modern technology, the photographer as an artist must be analyzed and criticized by the same aesthetic criteria applied to painter or sculptor.

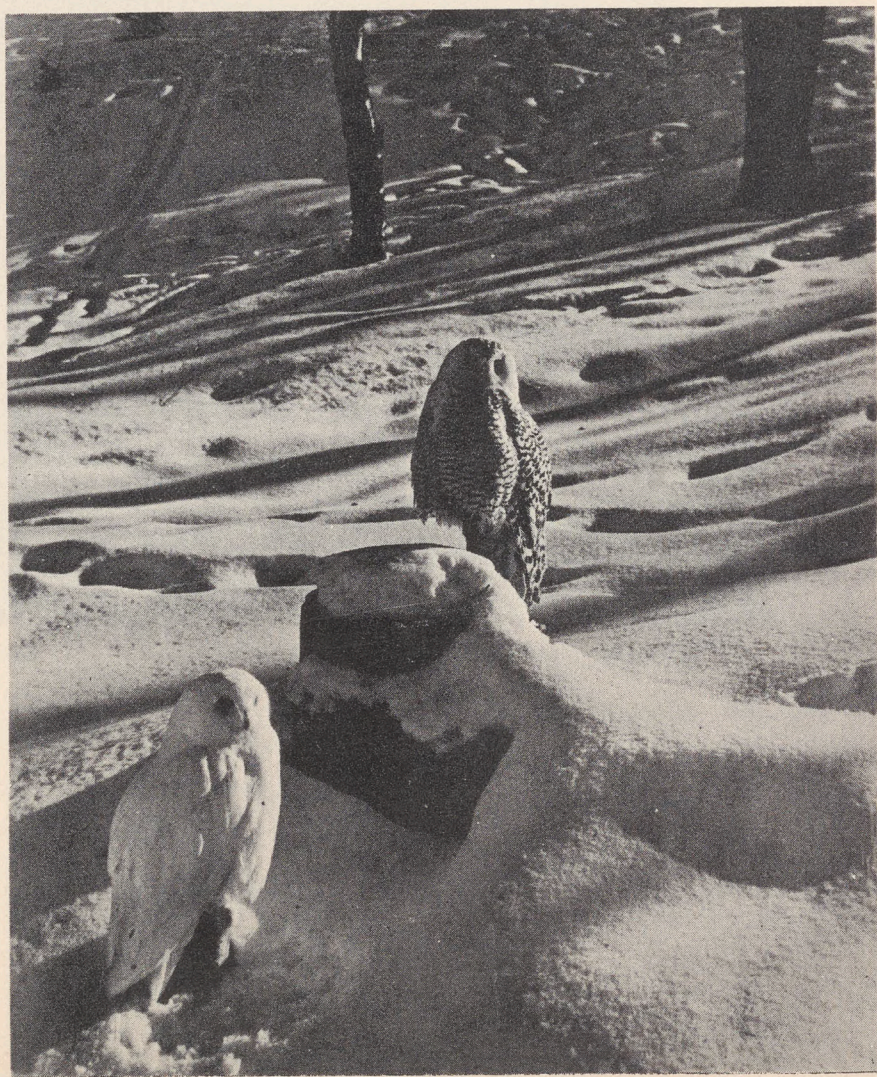

In all aspects of the Fine Arts it is easy to pay too much attention to technical mastery and not demand sufficiently the fresh and imaginative sight that is the most important strength of any artist. Exhibitions of photography have an increasing tendency to be academic, a curious state of affairs for this youngest of the arts; one faces the reluctant conclusion that original vision is as rare among photographers as among painters.

To make good pictures and print them beautifully is one craft, but to see originally is quite another and more precious gift, and it is for that one searches.
